NEW: The 2020 Sustainability Series
Welcome to the year 2020! We wish you all the best and good luck with keeping your new year’s resolutions. Did you know that the three most common resolutions for this year are to reduce stress levels, spend more time with friends and family, and eat healthier? (This year newly on the list) to live more sustainable? This year, 64% of the survey responders think this is the perfect opportunity for the 20th century. So, are you preparing a series of short articles you will find in our newsletters that addresses questions and answers all around sustainability?
We have all wondered about the plastic waste produced during a long day in the lab. Are there issues in the lab we are not aware of? There are studies that look at the impact of laboratories on the climate. One of the studies was published by Harvard University in which they conclude that the space which accounts for only 2% of the Harvard campus area contributes half of the energy consumption.

In our following newsletters, we will bring you interesting facts about where energy is wasted, how much trash is produced and how we can learn from research centers that have started movements to reduce their environmental footprint in the laboratory. Through our articles, you can get an overview of the current discussions about environmental protection.
We will also bring you a collection of ideas on what you can do differently in the lab, at home, in the office, on your commute, and at home.
